PART 2:

FINAL EVALUATOR'S comments on revised paper (if any)	Authors' response to final evaluator's comments
Although the authors have attempted to improve the paper with better clarity and completeness, the paper remains riddled with spelling and grammatical mistakes. This makes it very hard for a reader to always understand what the authors are trying to say. It also raises the question of whether the authors take the publication of a paper very seriously, as there clearly has not gone a lot of effort into the more technical aspects of the paper. In light of these issues, I maintain that in its current form the paper is not at the expected standard for an academic journal article. If the paper is to be published, however, there really needs to be more emphasis placed on the manner in which the information is conveyed. Ultimately you need to ask yourself why a reader should take the paper seriously when it seems as though the authors do not bother checking for simple things such as clarity of argument and grammar.
